Editor's Letter

'VSU is about choice' is a powerful argument based on a noble ideal – an ideal capable of much good. But what happens if we cling to ideals when it is so plain that in reality they will make us all worse off?

In the case of VSU, what happens the moment you apply it, the moment you ask 'The choice of what?' What happens is this seemingly unquestionable argument looks a whole lot grubbier, more zealous and more like a very bad idea.

By giving us the choice - in the name of choice - of whether to spend or not to spend, we will be worse off. Make no bones about it. People, being people, will not spend, no matter the benefits. As a result we will permanently lose services, and the shining knight of private enterprise will not charge into a market that barely runs for a third of each year. We will learn less. We will have fewer opportunities. Barring some seachange philosophy that having less makes you better off, it cannot be argued that VSU will make universities or students any better off. A bulk of VSU supporters will agree with this.

So what are we left with? What choice do we have? We have the choice to do nothing and to have less – nothing more. And this is hardly noble. This is hardly aspirational.

This is, however, still a disconcerting problem. On one hand we have a powerful ideal that is capable of much good and on the other the full knowledge that it will be damaging. We might ask ourselves how we reconcile this, but I have a simple suggestion: reality wins. Surely, no matter how glorious the concept sounds it must give way to practicality.

Even the soundest concept has exceptions. Lots of exceptions. We encounter them every day and we solve them every day. And this does not make us bad or foolish people. What does make us foolish is to cling to an ideal while staring in the face of resounding evidence that it will be detrimental to us all; to mistake that ideal for the truth.

If there is an argument for VSU, choice is not it.

President's Report

By David Hume

Dear Members,
I've never started one of my reports with a quote, except for quotes of myself. But this week I thought I'd start with something from Winston Churchill who, when discussing democracy said "The best argument against democracy is a five minute conversation with the average voter." This week you have your opportunity to prove Churchill wrong and engage in your democratic right to vote on your own campus in the Union elections.

Before you pick up Blitz, you will surely already have been accosted by someone wearing a fluoro coloured shirt, promising to provide free parking in Kensington (and the rest of the world) and lower taxes and better services. The person will probably have a bad slogan like 'Whom, Hume?' or 'Vote big. Vote Bosko'. If you're like many students, you'll probably lie and say that you've already voted. If you do that, then you're as bad as the people Churchill was talking about.

The Union provides most of the non-academic services on campus: food, retail, entertainment, grants to clubs, the Unibar, courses, yellowshirts and a whole lot more. As a result, the elections this week for Directors of the Board of the Union, will have a major effect on the way that this university operates. This is particularly so because of the threat of VSU for next year.

I urge you to inform yourself about the candidates and vote. Check out the posters, read the pamphlets, talk to the candidates and their helpers and have a say. Don't think that it's just an annoyance, because it's an annoyance which could mean the difference between having clubs for grants and not, or having a kebab shop or not, or, at a broader level, between having a vibrant and welcoming campus community and not.

If you have any questions about the Union elections, feel free to email me on u.president@union.unsw.edu.au

Cheers,
Dave

This one goes out to the cabbies

By Matt Lim

Taxi drivers have been given the short end of the stick. They are commonly perceived as rude, ignorant and scam artists. Even worse, a lot of the time they are treated as lower class citizens, simply because they are driving us around. This is just not on.

I hardly ever catch taxis, but on the few occasions that I have, it has been a pleasant experience. I tend to strike up some friendly banter with the driver and most of the time they are more than happy to chat with me. The other night I was talking to Houssein who has been a taxi driver for four months now. While he doesn't exactly love his line of work, it's a job he works damn hard at and gets paid an average amount.

All taxi drivers have their stories. Most of them involve horrid passengers. Passengers who run off without paying is something that happens fairly regularly to every taxi driver I've spoken to so far. The crap thing is, there's not much they can do about it, even though it's straight-out robbery. Houssein tells me that most of the time fare evasion is planned, and one of his mates was stabbed for trying to get his fare. How sick is that? Drunken fools attacking a driver because they didn't want to pay him. What's wrong with people?

Most of the problems come from intoxicated passengers who act like they have a right to treat everyone else like dirt. This makes Friday and Saturday nights somewhat of a paradox to taxi drivers. They are the biggest money-earners from potential fares, but they're also the nights drivers dread. Not only do drunks not pay, but they do things like vomit all over the backseat of the taxi, which naturally has to be cleaned up by the driver. Hearing these stories can really change your outlook.

It's time to appreciate those who do seemingly menial and unglamorous jobs. These people are doing the kind of things we hate to do; for this they deserve at least the same amount of respect as any other person. How often do you see a taxi driver or cleaner give you attitude the same way a stuck up brat working in a retail store does? Personally, I've never wanted to punch a cleaner for being rude. Perspective is a wonderful thing, but I'll save that topic for another column.

VSU and You

The Higher Education Support Amendment Bill 2005 is expected by the Howard Government to pass through the Senate after July and come into effect on January 1, 2006. This bill states that universities must not require students to become a member of an organisation or be required to pay for any non-academic services unless they choose to use them. This means, among other things, that students would be able to choose whether or not they wish to pay union fees, hence the term Voluntary Student Unionism (VSU).

Opposition to this legislation has been vocal, as has support for it, and discussion of its merits and flaws throughout the university and wider communities has been at times heated. To give you a better idea of the arguments for and against voluntary student unionism, Blitz has invited a supporter of VSU and an opponent of VSU to explain the principles behind their opinions and also to describe their vision of what university life would be like under VSU.

Thomas Tudehope is an advisor to Liberal MP, Malcolm Turnbull, and Secretary of the UNSW Liberal Club. He is a supporter of VSU. We ask Thomas what are the principles behind his support for VSU. The following is the opinion solely of Thomas Tudehope.

I support voluntary student unionism for a number of reasons. Firstly, I believe in freedom of association. I believe that no one should be forced to join a union, just like no one should be forced to support the Balmain Tigers, if they don't want to. A laughable example you might say, but so is forcing students to pay five hundred dollars a year in activity fees when they rarely see any return.

While I would consider myself an active university student (I manage to attend all my classes, which is unusual for an arts student), there are many students who rarely engage in the services offered by the Union or the Guild. As Brendan Nelson, Commonwealth Minister for Education, Science and Training correctly pointed out, why should a single mother studying nursing part time pay for someone to join the mountaineering club?

Secondly, I believe in effective representation. Throughout my three years at university I have continued to ask myself what true representation is. Non-compulsory Guild elections dominated by far-left political groups, some funded by the Communist Party of Australia, are not true representation and quite frankly I am not sure that they are representation at all.

Indeed, I have had my taste of student politics, enough of a taste to scald the lips, churn the stomach and quash the mind. The National Union of Students (NUS), for example, provides a clear reason for the introduction of voluntary student unionism. In 2002 I attended the NUS national conference in Ballarat. NUS is meant to represent all students nationally, yet the Australian flag was not allowed on the conference floor.

If we are to further examine the National Union of Students it is not hard to see how far misrepresentation has gone. In 1997 NUS made a six figure donation to the Palestinian Liberation Organisation. A year later they made another six figure donation - this time to the Communist Party of Malaya. And last year NUS gave the Australian Labor Party $220,000 to campaign in marginal Liberal seats, the same marginal seats that overwhelmingly delivered the Howard Government its fourth term in government.

What effect do you think VSU would have on university life if it was implemented in its current proposed form?

Firstly I would like to point out that under the proposed model of voluntary student unionism, students can still pay their student union fees and become members if they choose. Come March next year, I will be very interested to see exactly how many students elect to pay their student fees. My guess is that it will be somewhere in the vicinity of 1.2% to 1.8%. That roughly equates to about 600 enrolled students. Why will this be the case? Because unions fail and have failed to offer clear incentives for students to become members.

Many students, mainly the radical ones, have tried to suggest that services will no longer exist on a campus after VSU is implemented; as I walk around campus I am continually confronted with signs saying "This service will not exist under VSU." This is blatantly false, and the Guild in particular should be severely reprimanded for misleading students. Next year services will still exist, however they will not receive any subsidies from the Union. Will the services disappear? Absolutely not. For those of us who live in the real world, we are all too familiar with that wonderful term 'private enterprise'. Private enterprise will fill the void created by subsidy free services. Indeed it is already happening.

Admittedly, many aspects of university life will be altered under voluntary student unionism. However I would suggest such alterations will be for the betterment of students.

Sporting clubs are one aspect of university life that will change under the proposed model of voluntary student unionism. The Sports Association in particular have been very vocal in their claims that sporting clubs will suffer greatly. This is a myopic view of voluntary student unionism. It comes back to that question of why the majority should fund the activities of a minority. Next year, members of the AFL Club, the Underwater Club, the Abseiling Club and the Rugby Union Club, to name but a few, will have to fund their own sporting activities. Memberships to these clubs will no longer be subsidised by the Sports Association. Is this unfair? Is this inequitable? Hardly.

David Hume is President of the University of New South Wales Union. He opposes VSU. Blitz asks David what are the principles behind his opposition to VSU.

The VSU legislation is objectionable on the basis of the following principles:

UNSW is a community. Universities are more than just a classroom or a 'degree factory'; the breadth of university education derives from the quality of its community services. University campuses must be welcoming and enjoyable, and the success of this depends on a community sustainable only through the contribution of all students.

Communities have the right of self-determination. Universities have the right to say that non-academic services are essential to what it means to be 'a university'. They should also have the right to charge people entering the community for the provision of those services. This is the nature of all the communities that surround us: all tiers of government, RSL clubs, private schools and more all charge fees to community members for the provision of services.

The Government's stance sends fundamentally contradictory messages to universities and students. On one hand the Government says that universities should attract international students, cater for disadvantaged students, make degrees more flexible, encourage a healthy lifestyle and prepare students better for the workplace; on the other hand the Government wants to remove the means for universities to do this.

What effect do you think VSU would have on university life if it were implemented in its current form?

If VSU is introduced, this university will be a very different place when you turn up next year, as most non-academic services simply can't be offered under VSU. Fundamentally, VSU will push universities toward being bland institutions that offer only a degree on a piece of paper and nothing more. This is because VSU will have a drastic effect on all the services that provide the fabric of the university community.

You might ask that if these services are so essential, won't students voluntarily pay for them? Recent history shows that students won't. A similar model of VSU was introduced in Western Australia in the 1990s. On average, only 15-20% of students were prepared to pay for non-academic services. Because of the terrible effects this had on university communities, the WA Government rolled back the legislation.

Does this mean that students just don't want campus community? It doesn't for three good reasons:

Human nature. People generally don't pay up-front fees for services even though they get value for money in the long run. Extensive economic research shows that people make irrational decisions when confronted with short-term versus long-term economic dilemmas: people will put off 'pain' in the short-term, even though it means more 'pain' in the long-term. Applied to community services, this means people will irrationally not pay a one-off fee, even though they would gain value in the long-term.

Many university non-academic services are public goods. How would you stop people who haven't paid for non-academic services from using the Mathews student lounge? Or from listening to a band on the Library Lawn? It just doesn't make sense — many non-academic services are non-excludable (or excludable only at a very high cost). This leads to a basic 'free rider' problem, resulting in a reduced incentive to pay for community services.

The value of 'community' is non-quantifiable. It is difficult to quantify and 'bring home' the value of community to people, making it difficult to market to money-conscious students. This is magnified by the problem of free riders.

There are some other arguments often put forward for VSU and I'll look at them quickly:

Myth: Compulsory non-academic service fees violate the right to freedom of association.

Fact: Freedom of association refers to the right not to be forced to be a member of an association. No student is currently forced to be a member of an association; if a student wants, their fee can be directed to a university fund.

Myth: Provision of non-academic services at campuses is inefficient and wasteful.

Fact: The organisations providing non-academic services are subject to all ordinary financial controls, performance indicators and accountability mechanisms of major corporations. Often they focus on service (rather than a narrowly-defined concept of efficiency or profit), as would be expected from not-for-profit community service providers.

Myth: Non-academic service fees are a barrier to entry for disadvantaged students.

Fact: Community services are essential for disadvantaged students. Legal and welfare advice, in particular, is absolutely vital and funded through non-academic service fees. If anything, the solution here is for the Government to allow non-academic service fees to be included in HECS.

VSU is not just about the student organisations — the Union, Guild, Sports Association and PGB. It's not just about whether you like these organisations or the way they're run. It's not just about whether you get annoyed that your fees go to sporting fields you don't use or subsidised coffee that you don't drink. It's about universities and the fact that they simply won't be able to provide anything other than a classroom. Ultimately, VSU is an attack on the idea that universities are communities where you can make friends, discover more about yourself, develop life skills and a network of people you will know for your entire professional life. If you do think that this is your university, then I urge you to oppose VSU.

A Model Society

The Asia-Pacific Model UN Conference will be held during the mid-semester recess from July 11-15. Allison Corkery is the secretary of the UNSW UN Society and Secretary General of the event. April Smallwood talked to her about the event and what it's all about.

What is AMUNC?

It's a huge conference that will test peoples' ability to think critically about international issues. Those involved will work closely in their group to develop possible solutions for current global issues. The idea of a mock UN started here at UNSW in 1995 and we haven't hosted the conference since. The theme for this year is Participation in the Global Community. It's going to be held on campus in Scientia, Mathews and CLB. There will be people coming from all over the world. We weren't expecting such a big turn out but unis all across Australia have students attending and we've got people coming from NZ, the US, Ghana and the Philippines. There'll be about 500 people altogether.

What goes on?

Basically, for the duration of one week, all delegates will become a representative of their allocated country and will then be sitting on a committee who together will participate in furthering their country's interest. Everyone will be in discussion with their committee and on the last day everyone will come together to read out their resolutions.

Why does the conference aim to model the UN?

People have this idea that the UN is this big abstract entity and don't really know what goes on there. By role-playing what goes on, those involved will have a better understanding of what goes on and possibly why decisions are made the way that they are. It's also very rewarding to understand what it's like to actually be in a position where you have to represent and cater to your national interests.

Do you have any UN members come and watch the conference?

They don't come along to the committees, but throughout the week they visit to take part in the careers forum and the international advocacy workshop. Their presence gives delegates the chance to talk with different NGOs. The UN Society at UNSW is probably one of the most well established ones in the state. We have a good reputation with the diplomatic community and professionals. It also helps that people like to talk about what they're doing.

What other activities or events can students become involved in?

We often hold drinks and discussion evenings or debates on various world issues and we have a series of diplomats who come in for an event called Country Perspectives where every few weeks a diplomat or a consulate comes to speak about their country.

What does the UN Society do for the global community?

It's not so much what we do, since we kind of see ourselves as more educative in that sense; we're not just like a PR mouth-piece for the UN. We're actually independent and impartial in that sense. I guess we just try and create a space on campus where people can learn more about the UN and also provide the chance to express their own opinions and critiques as well.

Do current members hope to work for the real UN some day?

I think some of them do. Providing that kind of network seems to be a good starting point, since the UN is a relatively small organisation on a global scale. Their overall budget has been said to be less than that of the Tokyo fire department. The society is here to spread the message that there are other things you can do in order to be in the global community besides working for the UN or DEFAT (Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade).

Do all kinds of students take part?

The UN shouldn't be something that only arts and politics students are interested in; it's actually a highly interdisciplinary organisation. It's also got subsidiary organisations within it. We have a few academics in the membership. Last year we did an event on shrinking water resources and we had 70-80 engineering students come along. Development work like that requires people with skill, not solely politicians who can talk about it.

What current international issues are being discussed?

This year marks the 60th anniversary of the UN, so there's a lot going on with that. They're possibly going to change the structure of the UN's security council. In 2000, some countries agreed to adhere to eight Millennium Development Goals, some of which were to eradicate extreme poverty by the year 2015, improve women's health and tackle HIV and poverty. This September the UN will come together to track the progress of such goals. It's also the international year of Microcredit, which is where banks give very small loans to people in third world countries to buy things like agricultural tools. $100 to a small community makes a big impact on boosting their economy.

What about someone with zero awareness of international affairs? Can they join?

Well, the UN is made up of various bits and pieces that fit together and it's not just about politics; having an awareness of global issues really does affect everyone and how they interact globally, whether they're conscious of it or not. I don't think people should feel intimidated by joining the society. A lot of people think that people in our UN society must know so much but we really don't! That's why you would join, to learn more. The message is that having a global consciousness is important for everyone no matter what you end up doing with your life.

Quasimoto - The Further Adventures of Lord Quas

The idea must occur to every stoner at some stage in their life that the act of recording their wiped-out, vague, stuttering conversations and setting them to music would open a vast mine of comedy gold that must be unleashed upon a grateful world. Fortunately for the world, most stoners have nowhere near the amount of cash, drugs or motivation to make this happen.

Quasimoto is one exception. His album The Further Adventures of Lord Quas is 26 tracks of half-tunes and sound-bytes, all thrown together without regard for continuity or sense. At one moment Lord Quas will be rapping in his high, nasally voice about "...gettin' more ass than toilet paper." Another will feature random voices talking about, well, I'm not exactly sure. In between all this some music might break out, but not for long.

While it might appear that making no sense from second to second is a disadvantage, it must be remembered that in the state of Quasimoto's desired audience, a second can be an awfully long time. Perhaps the album's true genius might lay in a state of mind, but 26 tracks would be an awfully long time if it didn't. - Ben Smyth

KT Tunstall - Eye To The Telescope

New and upcoming young artist KT Tunstall is a Chinese-Scottish delight. Her name is actually Kate but she prefers KT as it has "...a bit more attitude". Her debut album, Eye to the Telescope is impressive. With a mellow and familiar sound, KT Tunstall could be taken for a mix of Norah Jones and Tori Amos. She plays her music and writes her songs, something very few of her age can boast these days.

Her lyrics come with a tone of modesty and each song is deeply heartfelt. The choruses are simple and slightly catchy but not in a bad way. She has an earthly individuality to her sound and most of her songs reminisce of failed love and calm waters.

"My songs examine and explore little specific emotions or situations or stories," she explains. "They're kitchen table songs, like a conversation between me and one other person." Tracks such as 'Another Place to Fall' and 'Under the Weather' are easy listening and ensure that this girl has got the goods. 'Heal Over' is a ballad about moving on, about learning to get over the past and mend. If you're into soft rock and a Capella sounds, get your ears ready for KT - April Smallwood.

Jin - The Rest is History

Jin broke out of obscurity in the US after performing on the music video show 106 & Park, where he lyrically battled and defeated challenging freestyle rhymer seven weeks in a row. Not long after, he was signed by the Ruff Ryders label, and...well, the album title says it all.

Those who have seen or heard some of Jin's performances will agree that he is indeed a talent. The problem is that Jin hasn't translated this into a quality album; The Rest Is History doesn't have that live energy. Most of the problem comes down to poor production. The backing beats for some tracks seem amateur and boring. There is hope in tracks such as 'Love Story', 'Thank You' and 'Cmon' which allow a more personal insight to the rapper, but his most well known single, 'Learn Chinese' is actually one of the weakest.

The Rest is History is an average debut album. At times it seems that Jin is trying to play on his title as "The only Chinese rapper in the game," more than his talents. There is definite potential, but unfortunately it doesn't get a chance to stand out - Matt Lim.

Blitz has five copies of KT Tunstall's latest single, 'Black Horse and the Cherry Tree', to give away. To win, rearrange the letters in the following phrase to form a new phrase that has been used in this edition of Blitz: INSTANTLY UNVIRTUOUS DEMON

2005 ELECTION OF FOUR (4) ORDINARY MEMBERS TO THE UNIVERSITY OF NEW SOUTH WALES UNION BOARD OF DIRECTORS CANDIDATES' STATEMENTS

Rehana AHMED

Hi, I'm Rehana Ahmed. Since starting university as a part-time Commerce student in 2004, I have been involved with a variety of clubs and associations that are a part of UNSW and I have seen first hand the benefits, opportunities and potential of student organisations – if given proper direction. This is particularly an issue for part-time students such as myself, for whom the opportunities are less obvious simply because we are not on campus as much as an ordinary student.

I believe all students have a right to student services. University is about more than just a degree - it's also about the vibrant student life and culture that organisations such as the Union provide for. The Union must have an active board ready to combat VSU and its negative ramifications. We must preserve student services and ensure that regardless of what happens, student life is never destroyed.

Kate BARTLETT

I am a third year Arts student and have been involved with the Union from my first year at University. I have taken part in many of the valuable volunteer programs offered by the organisation and am currently a member of the Food and Retail Committee. My aim in running for the UNSW Union Board is to contribute to the organisation that I feel has offered me many opportunities throughout my degree. I feel that it is important to maintain a financially viable institution should Voluntary Student Unionism come into place and will work hard to ensure that. Other policy objectives of mine include making it easier for students to pay their fees by providing options such as repayment schedules; more varied entertainment and social options for students; and providing more opportunities for students to increase their skills going into the workforce to ensure better employment.

Belinda BENTLEY

Hi my name is Belinda, but feel free to call me Bel. I am 19 and a second year Science/Arts student. So I guess I'm going to be here for a while. The reason why I am running for Union Board Director is not because I think I can make one dramatic change but because I care about the direction of services for students on campus and I think I can make a genuine difference. Like many students, I choose to work hard to get through Uni and when I come onto campus I want to be able to have access to things that I need from day to day. At the end of the day, it is your choice as students to determine your own needs. Vote for me to ensure that what we need as students is what we are going to get and nothing less.

Josh BRANDON

As a student for four years (Media/Communications), active in campus life (Student Theatre, Law Revue – directing this year) and a volunteer for many of the Union's programs (Yellow Shirts, Anti-VSU Campaign, among others) – in addition to serving on its Finance Committee – I believe I can best ensure that the Union will continue to thrive as the community centre of Campus and respond even more to the needs of its members.

My proposals include:

- Making the $2 coffee trial permanent
- Better feedback avenues, such as one-on-one student consultations with Board Directors.
- 8 cent photocopying and other money-saving measures for members

Importantly:

- Students need a voice in the governance of their organisation, and someone who will listen and respond to them.
- With VSU on the horizon, we need experienced people – knowledgeable in the operation of the Union – to see it through the challenging times ahead.

2005 ELECTION OF FOUR (4) ORDINARY MEMBERS TO THE UNIVERSITY OF NEW SOUTH WALES UNION BOARD OF DIRECTORS CANDIDATES' STATEMENTS

Andrew O'LOUGHLIN

Do you often find yourself asking, "where are all the superheroes on campus?" "Why is HackASS the only Superhero on campus?" "Why don't I have a caped crusader to escort me at night?"

The Union has failed to deliver when it comes to making UNSW a Superhero friendly campus. Instead of promising promises that cannot be delivered on, like "shaking up" The Union, making The Union more "accountable" and "responsive to student needs", I – Hac- I mean Roo (Andrew O'Loughlin), will push for the following changes.

- Gimp masks sold on campus
- XXXtra large condoms to be distributed. The well endowed have been discriminated against for too long.
- Pay the fines or bail applications of Superheroes in their service of UNSW.

Remember, I – Ha- Roo (Andrew O'Loughlin) am the only candidate endorsed by HackASS UNSW's favourite (and only) Superhero and Stuntmaster extraordinaire.

James YE

Hi guys! My name is James Ye. I'm a 2nd year Commerce/Law student. Uni has so much more to offer than just a degree! Uni is about campus life, whether it's soaking up the sunshine on the library lawn, lighting up the dance floor at the Roundhouse, or participating in your favourite club or society.

The Union is the centre of campus life. It contributes hugely to the social life of students through drinks and parties – but the Union is more than just fun and games – it's about developing students personally through volunteerism and other programs. The Union faces many challenges in the near future with the introduction of VSU, it's even more important now for students to represent students on the Union Board to ensure it never loses sight of why it exists – working to organise events and provide services FOR student needs.

We can do better.

2005 ELECTION OF FOUR (4) ORDINARY MEMBERS TO THE UNIVERSITY OF NEW SOUTH WALES UNION BOARD OF DIRECTORS CANDIDATES' STATEMENTS

Steve<sup>2</sup> LEGG

Voluntary Student Unionism (VSU) is a considerable threat to the UNSW Union. When similar legislation was introduced in Western Australia, student organizations only managed to recoup between 6 and 33% of the fees under a compulsory system. Student fees represent around a third of the Union's current revenues. The Union will need to investigate alternative sources of funding such as sponsorship or cost cutting through reduction of subsidies and service levels involving considerable restructuring of Union activities.

Whilst Treasurer of the Union we have:

- conducted cost/benefit analysis of the organization
- reviewed operation of the Union's commercial services department
- investigated alternative fee structures
- budgeted for V.S.U. under differing scenarios

If re-elected I will:

- drive alternative revenue raising through sponsorship, external catering and commercial operation of the Union's food and retail outlets;
- push for restructuring of internal Union services (HR, accounts, IT, Building) to reduce costs.

Tipping the Balance

by Rob Gascoigne

On July 1 of this year, the terms of half of the representatives in the Australian Senate will end and those Senators elected in last October's general election will take their seats. What is unique about this incoming government is that the Coalition will now have power over both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

For 38 of the last 43 years, the government of the day has not had a majority in the Senate. The last government to have the luxury of a bicameral (having two legislative bodies) majority was Malcolm Fraser. If you are twenty-two years old or younger, this is an event that has not occurred in your lifetime.

What this constitutive difference between the Lower and Upper Houses has generally meant is that a government, in order to pass legislation, has had to make agreements and compromises with non-government Senators. When a minor party or an independent Senator has had the 'balance of power' in the Senate, they have had a lot of influence over the legislation being moved through the chamber. In 2000, for example, the Australian Democrats struck a deal with the government in order to pass the GST; certain concessions were made and the government's proposed tax gained a Senate majority and became law.

The need for governments to make these sorts of concessions has, on occasion, proved a thorn in the side of the government of the day. Prime Minister Keating once dismissed the Senate as "unrepresentative swill" because it forced compromises from what he believed to be the 'legitimate' government – the majority formed in the House of Representatives.

Keating's difficulties have been shared by other Prime Ministers, not least of all John Howard. Howard has had a lot of difficulty in moving a number of his proposed reforms through the Senate, such as the Government's proposed reforms to Student Unionism. But come July, the Government's problems in the Senate will be reduced. The need to make deals with independent or minor party Senators, or compromise on a particular policy platform, will evaporate and the Government will, within the limits of the Constitution, have a free hand to do what it likes.

Whether you think this situation is good or bad will depend on your own approach to politics. Even if you're not a supporter of the Coalition, you might support strong government. But, no matter what your stance on the operation of government, you've got to wonder what changes the government will put in place without any institutional restraints acting on it.

It's a major gear shift if you think about it: protesters will have to target the representatives who are forming policies, rather than aligning themselves with those who are opposing them.

In the past, governments that have had a bicameral majority have not made many major reforms. This has apparently been one of the principle criticisms made of the Fraser government of 1975-1983 from within the Coalition. John Howard was Treasurer in that government and it can be confidently assumed that he has very clear ideas of what could have been done with that opportunity. It's unlikely that he will let this chance pass him by. Moreover, there's a lot of pressure on him now from groups that have given both financial and political support to the Coalition to ensure that they use this opportunity to make some major changes. If ever there was a time where the Howard Government was going to implement a major reform agenda, this is going to be it.

The potential implications of an unfettered government are self-evident. But perhaps what's going to be most interesting is how, in the next three years, opposition to the Government's agenda will operate. Senator Kerry Nettle, Greens Senator for NSW and UNSW Alumnus, has some very clear ideas on this. "In the past, people that have disagreed with government policy have been able to make three phone calls: to the Greens, Democrats and Labor," says the Senator, "but now the only way to influence legislation ... is if Coalition backbenchers are made aware that the concerns in their electorate are so great that they themselves will start to feel uncomfortable about pursuing that agenda."

If there is going to be opposition to the Government's reforms it will have to be conducted outside of Parliament, in the hope of influencing Coalition Senators. The only checks on the executive's power will come from within the governing Coalition itself. It's a major gear shift if you think about it: protesters will have to target those representatives who are forming policies, rather than aligning themselves with those who are opposing them.

Senator Nettle goes on to point out, however, that protesters who take this course of action will have to be strategic about it. "People from regional communities tend to hear the voices within their communities more strongly," she says. "In the current debate on VSU for example, talking to Senators or members who cover areas that rely on a regional university - and a lack of university services meaning a lack of services and employment for the whole local community - could have a really significant impact." Politics will be conducted now, not by those with common interests, but by those who strategically approach their opponents.

No matter who you are or what you do, the change in the constitution of government is going to affect you. The impact is likely greater if you consider that most of the people reading this will be entering the workforce full-time within the next three years. Until the next election, Australian politics will operate in an entirely new manner. If you're in favour of this, it will mean a change in your appreciation of government. But, if you're opposed to it, it's going to mean that you will have to rethink the way you approach politics – the way you play the game. It's going to be an interesting three years.

Things you should already know:

A brief crash-course in Australian parliamentary politics

Candidates for Australian Federal Government stand for election every three years. Potential members in the House of Representatives stand in a particular electorate (a geographical area with a size determined by its population. There are 150 electorates). Potential Senators run for representation within a state or territory (12 per state, two per territory). Candidates can stand as independents, but most are members of a political party.

The term of a Senator is six years rather than three. This means that at each general election (excluding a double-dissolution), only half of the seats in the Senate are up for re-election.

The party that gains the most seats in the Representatives forms government. The persons that lead the government form the executive cabinet, which determines the government's policy direction. Note that the existence of political parties is not a requirement of the Constitution; technically Australia could be governed with nothing but 226 independent representatives and no Prime Minister.

A proposed policy is presented to the House of Representatives in the form of a 'bill'. The bill must be passed by majority through the Representatives before it moves on to the Senate. If a majority of Senators agree to pass the bill, it goes to the Governor-General who gives it royal assent. It then becomes an Act and a binding law.

When a minor party or individual has the balance of power, it means that the major parties do not have enough votes to pass or reject a bill on their own. In this situation the vote of this minor party or independent is the decisive one.

Selling something? Buying something? Need a flatmate? Single? Studying at UNSW? Penniless?

Even if you are unlucky enough to be all of these things, you can solve them at the same time by putting a classified in Blitz! It might look something like this:

"Can't buy me love - but you can buy my 1989 Mitsubishi Lancer, powder blue, automatic, some rust. Will sell to, and subsequently spend the proceeds on, the right girl who is not afraid of commitment and can move in with seller after March 3. Buyer must also study at UNSW and be willing to car pool, as seller will no longer own transport."

Okay, so you can have separate classifieds if you want. The best thing is that if you're a UNSW student the classifieds are free for non-commercial use. Just email your classified to blitzeditor@union.unsw.edu.au no less than twelve days before (always a Wednesday) the magazine is released (always a Monday).
